Ericson's new torpedo boat is pronounced "the most formidable engine of death known in naval warfare." It consists of a vessel of the Monitor style, but much more completely protected, with a gun that throws a projectile of 250 pounds of dynamite, which explodes by concussion with the hostile vessel. The "nightiest iron ships are completely at the mercy" of this fearful machine.

The Lotus Club of New York gave General Grant a reception on the evening of the 21st. Whitelaw Reid, President of the club, in his address, spoke of the distinguished guest's services to the United States, said that the people could not afford to dispense with the experience gained at the head of the army and the helm of the Government, and hinted that Grant should be made Captain-General of the Army or a member of the highest National council, the Senate. In his response, General Grant wisely took occasion to say that he is not one of those who cry out against republics as being ungrateful, that he is satisfied with the American people's treatment of him, that he cares nothing about having any "future provision" made for him, and that he is ready to serve his country whenever it needs him. His remarks were evidently intended to put a stop to the conjectures as to "what shall be done with him."
